All that glitters is not gold.

Morton Blacke, the world renowned author, had it all. The mansion, fast cars, money to burn and fame. But behind the glitz and glamor were the remains of his broken and tattered private life. The demons that lurked there tormented Blacke's every waking moment.

Eccentric and brazen, two words that describe Blacke. Everyone recognizes him from his string of bestselling novels but everyone is equally timid to talk to him. Blacke's personality is a defense mechanism as he protects not only himself but those who get close to him.

As an author, Blacke never truly worked hard to develop best-selling novels. His metaphoric rise through the publishing world is unheard of. It is not a question of when his novels will become a bestseller but how big of a best seller. But, as with everything, there are dues to be paid. As Blacke ascends to new heights he must come to terms with the price he has paid and will pay. As the demons of past decisions mount, Blacke must make a new decision... continue gaining the fame and money or retreat and live life as a normal person does.

"Blacke" is a psychological thriller that will keep you guessing until the very last page.

Author Reagan Rothe takes you where few have ever been... inside the mind of another person. Rothe's ability to show us the darkness within in contrast to the fresh, vibrant settings is astounding. Rothe has developed characters in "Blacke" that will be remembered more for their flaws and short-comings than on their decisions and motivations.

The unknown specter in "blacke" instills enough suspense to make the reader wonder what is truly happening and what will happen by the end.

I recommend "blacke" to those who think the grass is always greener on the other side and the fans of psychological suspense. You will be left wondering why "he is Blacke and you are not."
